Caterpillars Can Cause Concern

Last winter was a friendly season for insects. As a result, a high number of caterpillars, such as the larvae of the Oak Processionary Moth (Thaumetopea processionae) are now present in Stuttgart.

On the skin of the caterpillars are many hair-like projections called setae. When the larvae sheds its skin, the setae can break off and float through the air. Contact with these hairs can cause skin and eye irritations. This can occur immediately or up to two hours after exposure. Affected skin may look like it has mite or insect bites.

This condition, caterpillar dermatitis, may be uncomfortable, but it rarely creates an emergency. Very infrequently, such exposure can result in an allergic reaction which would require immediate attention. If you experience nausea, vomiting, chest tightness, wheezing, swelling of unexposed skin or on the face, lightheadedness, or dizziness, then seek medical care immediately.

To prevent caterpillar dermatitis, the Stuttgart Health Clinic recommends the following:

- Do not allow children to play next to infested oak trees from May through July.
 - Cover your skin when near oak trees and do not walk in the underwood of forests.
 - If you do come in contact with the caterpillar hairs, shower as soon as possible and wash your clothing.
 - Benadryl or Hydrocortisone skin cream can reduce itching.
- For more information call 431-2157/civ. 07031-15-2157.
